

Trans-Siberian Railway

Russian Far Eastern province lies at the end of the world's longest railway, the Trans-Siberian. It was a tremendous task to build this railway, and it has been equally a great task to keep it in efficient operation. The distance from the Pacific terminus at Vladivostok to Moscow is 5,600 miles, and to Peking 4,200 miles.

On leaving Moscow, the Trans-Siberian road runs through about 500 miles of the great western plain of Europe. It crosses the Ural mountains, and then runs through the vast, empty spaces of Siberia. The road is a great feat of engineering, and a symbol of Russian power.

Across the vast stretches of western Siberia, the Trans-Siberian railway passes grassy steppes inhabited by many nomadic tribes. It crosses the Altai mountains, and then runs through the vast, empty spaces of Siberia. The road is a great feat of engineering, and a symbol of Russian power.

Many tunnels and bridges. By the time it reaches Lake Balkal, it has climbed again to 1,500 feet, and is skirting that body of water has reached the Pacific. The road is a great feat of engineering, and a symbol of Russian power.

From this it will be seen that the Trans-Siberian railway is a great feat of engineering, and a symbol of Russian power. It is a great feat of engineering, and a symbol of Russian power.

To guard against difficulties with China, such as those of recent months, Russia prepared two railway strings to her transportation base, the shorter Chinese Eastern line, built by Chinese capital, and the longer Trans-Siberian line, built by Russian capital. This branch forms a bow from Manchuria and meets the Chinese Eastern line again before reaching Vladivostok.

Across the Amur, the south line, or rather Manchuria, which, before the war, was being rapidly colonized. Still, the river there is truly an international line, and this was proved, if by nothing else, by the extensive smuggling that went on across it. The Amur province is in the same latitude as Newfoundland and has a climate that in some ways is comparable to the climate of that far northern American land.

MacDonald Visit Ends and Naval Conference Is Called by England

By EDWARD W. PICKARD
FIRST fruit of the momentous conversations between President Hoover and Prime Minister Ramsay MacDonald in London last night, was the announcement that the British government had decided to call a naval conference in London next January.

MacDonald's visit was a great success. He and his daughter, who was with him, were lavishly entertained, and the British government had decided to call a naval conference in London next January.

It was a great success. He and his daughter, who was with him, were lavishly entertained, and the British government had decided to call a naval conference in London next January. It was a great success.

Small wonder, then, that the visit was a great success. He and his daughter, who was with him, were lavishly entertained, and the British government had decided to call a naval conference in London next January.

In the way of exports, in its palm oil trade, it had nothing more important to give the world than oil. It was a great success.
